

Constructive Idea

I AM writing to advise the Ministry of Defence not to misuse this time of peace.

Too much of a good thing is monotonous. Soldiers in bases around the country have no work to do, except continuous manoeuvres and this brings boredom.

On many occasions soldiers are told to attend classes but due to boredom they go absent without leave.

My suggestion is that the Ministry should take advantage of this, and utilise the soldiers in bases in these times of peace.

It would be better if the Ministry could provide builders to show soldiers how to construct their own barracks and provide them with bulldozers and tractors to take part in agricultural projects.

If we keep our soldiers busy with productive tasks as well as constructive ones, this will give us a good reputation with the nation.

Soldiers need to be taught skills so that they could join workers' brigades with better qualifications whenever they leave their posts.

The more they produce, the more they will reserve; the more they construct, the more they will protect; the harder they work, the more they will be disciplined; the more they are taught, the more professional they will be.
