

Too Late To Reverse The Status Quo

DESPITE all the allegations and lessons learnt from the past about the incumbent President, none holds water until proven right, but it is acceptable for people to speculatively express themselves.

Many people believe that Pohamba will keep the status quo but experience just outside the border (Zambia-Mwanawasa) teaches us otherwise. I don't take charismatic theorists for granted, but I believe in collective leadership. So long as Pohamba is listening to intellectual advice and to the general public, he will definitely deliver beyond expectation.

The party's presidential elections are over and there is nothing one can do to reverse the situation and those who seemed the most preferred for the position hold relatively less support within their political abodes.

So, what else can a rational peace lover do? In this state of affairs, I think it should be a wait and see scenario from now on.
